

Kwame Nkrumah

REVOLUTIONARY PATH

KWAME NKRUMAH

PANAF
London

REVOLUTIONARY PATH

Copyright © Kwame Nkrumah—Panaf Books 1973

First published by Panaf Books 1973

Copyright © Gamal Nkrumah

— Estate of Kwame Nkrumah

Repinted 2001

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without the prior permission in writing of Panaf Books, nor be otherwise circulated in any form of binding or cover other than that in which it is published and without a similar condition including this condition being imposed on subsequent purchaser.

ISBN 0 90 1787 22 1

Panaf Books
75 Weston Street
London SE1 3RS

Printed and bound by Antony Rowe Ltd, Eastbourne

CONTENTS

Publisher's Note	9
PART ONE: THE STRUGGLE FOR NATIONAL LIBERATION
1 Towards Colonial Freedom . Written between 1942 and 1945. First published in 1962	13
2 Declaration to the Colonial Peoples of the World, Pan African Congress, Manchester, October 15th-21st, 1945	42
3 The Circle , 1945-47	45
4 Constitution of the Convention People's Party (CPP) 12th June 1949	51
5 Selected Editorials of the Accra Evening News	72
(i) Bullets or No Bullets, 13th January 1949
(ii) Organize! Organize!! Organize!!! 14th January 1949
(iii) The Spirit of a Nation, 15th February 1949
(iv) The Dawn of Positive Action, 10th March 1949
(v) Never Relax Your Efforts, 18th May 1949
(vi) The Struggle Goes On, 5th September 1949
(vii) We Shall Protest and Demonstrate to the World, 10th November 1949
6 What I Mean by Positive Action , 1949	85
7 Motion of Destiny, 10th July 1953	96
8 Midnight Speech, Ghana's Independence, 5th-6th March 1957	116
PART TWO: SOCIALIST CONSTRUCTION AND THE STRUGGLE FOR THE LIBERATION AND UNIFICATION OF AFRICA 1957-1966
9 Extracts from speech of welcome to representatives of independent African states at Accra Conference, 15th April 1958	125

10	Agenda and Call to Independence, All-African People's Conference, Accra, December 1958	130
11	Declaration of Principles, Sanniquellie Conference, July 1959	135
12	Speech at the Ceremonial Lighting of the Flame of African Freedom, Accra, 1st July 1960	142
13	Secret Agreement signed by Patrice Lumumba and Kwame Nkrumah in Accra, 8th August 1960	145
14	Extracts from Dawn Broadcast, 8th April 1961	151
15	Politicization of the Masses. Speeches at the Party Ideological Institute, Winneba, 18th February 1961 and 3rd February 1962	160
16	Work and Happiness. (1) Broadcast on 5th May 1962 (2) Speech to launch the Seven Year Development Plan, 11th March 1964	181
17	Speech at First Africanist Conference, Accra, 12th December 1962	205
18	Continental Government for Africa. Chapter 21 of Africa Must Unite , first published 1963	218
19	United We Stand. Speeches at the Conference of African Heads of State and Governments in Addis Ababa, May 1963	229
20	Charter of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) signed in Addis Ababa on 25th May 1963; and Address to the National Assembly of Ghana on the occasion of the Ratification of the Charter, 21st June 1963	249
21	Proposals for a Union Government of Africa. Speech delivered at the Summit Conference of the OAU, Cairo, 19th July 1964	276
22	A New Africa. Speech at opening of the Summit Conference of the OAU, Accra, 21st October 1965	298
23	Extracts from Neo-Colonialism: The Last Stage of Imperialism , first published in 1965	310
24	One Man, One vote (1) Call for Action in Rhodesia. Address to the National Assembly, 25th November 1965 (2) Ghana breaks diplomatic relations with Britain. Address to the National Assembly, 16th December 1965.	341

25	Sessional Address, Ghana National Assembly, 1st February 1966	368
PART THREE: CLASS STRUGGLE, AND THE ARMED PHASE OF THE AFRICAN REVOLUTION
	Introduction	389
26	Voice from Conakry . The first broadcast to the people of Ghana on Radio Guinea's 'Voice of the Revolution', 6th March 1966	391
27	The Big Lie . Chapter 5 of Dark Days in Ghana , first published in 1967	394
28	Ghana: The Way Out . Statement to the people of Ghana, 1968	414
29	The Spectre of Black Power , 1968	421
30	The Struggle Continues : (1) Message to the Black People of Britain, 1968 (2) Africa Day Special Message, 1968	429
31	Two Myths : (1) The Myth of the 'Third World' (2) 'African Socialism' revisited, 1968	435
32	Extracts from Books One and Two of the Handbook of Revolutionary Warfare , first published in 1967	446
33	Extracts from Class Struggle in Africa , first published in 1970	488
	Conclusion	519

PUBLISHER'S NOTE

This book, published posthumously, was compiled during the last two years of the author's life. It was begun in response to many requests for a single volume which would contain key documents, some of them previously unpublished, relating to the development and consistency of Kwame Nkrumah's political thought, and which would at the same time illustrate landmarks in his career as a leading theorist and activist of the African Revolution.

Many of the introductory passages to the documents, specially those in the last half of Part Two, and the general Introduction to Part Three, were written when the illness which finally overcame him was far advanced, and when he was in considerable pain. The Conclusion to the book was dictated by him in October 1971, in a clinic in Bucarest, Romania, where he was receiving medical treatment. Kwame Nkrumah of Africa died in Bucarest six months later, on the 27th of April 1972. He died far from his beloved Africa, and fighting to the last to recover his health so that he might continue to serve the people of Africa and the cause which filled his whole life, the ending of all forms of exploitation and oppression, and the building of a world in which all may live in dignity and peace.

Documents have been reproduced in their original form and style, or as first printed by the Government Printing Department, Accra, Ghana.

PART ONE

THE STRUGGLE FOR NATIONAL LIBERATION

1

From the Foreword to the 1962 edition of Towards Colonial Freedom

'In 1942 when I was a student in the United States of America, I was so revolted by the ruthless colonial exploitation and political oppression of the people of Africa that I knew no peace. The matter exercised my mind to such a degree that I decided to put down my thoughts in writing and to dilate on the results of some of my research concerning the subject of colonialism and imperialism.

My studies at that time, however, left me little time to devote to this work, and it was not until I arrived in London in 1945 and came face to face with the colonial question, experiencing first hand the determination of worker and student bodies fighting and agitating for colonial freedom in the very heart of a country that possessed a vast colonial empire, that I was stimulated to complete this booklet.

It was not really surprising that in spite of much effort on my part, I was unable to find anybody who would undertake to publish my work at that time. I managed to get a few copies printed privately, and these in turn were copied by mimeograph and other means, and distributed to those actively engaged in the freedom movement of Africa.'

But it was not until 1962 that the work was published in London. It was printed exactly as it was originally written. No changes or corrections were made, and nothing was added or taken from it. The views I expressed then are precisely the views I hold today concerning the nature of imperialism and colonialism. Furthermore, most of the points I made then have been borne out to the letter, and confirmed by subsequent developments in Africa and Asia.

There is, however, one matter on which my views have been expanded, and that is regarding African unification. When Towards Colonial Freedom was written, my ideas on African unity, important even as I considered them at that time, were limited to West African unity as a first step. Since I have had the opportunity of putting my ideas to work, and in the intensification of neocolonialism, I lay even greater stress on the vital importance to Africa's survival of a political unification of the entire African continent. Regional groupings, specially when based purely on economic co-operation, in areas which are already dominated by neocolonialist interests, retard rather than promote the unification process.

TOWARDS COLONIAL FREEDOM

PREFACE

This essay affirms, and postulates as inevitable, the national solidarity of colonial peoples and their determination to end the political and economic power of colonial governments. The purpose of this pamphlet is to analyse colonial policies, the colonial mode of production and distribution and of imports and exports. It is to serve as a rough blue-print of the processes by which colonial peoples can establish the realization of their complete and unconditional independence.

We have read articles, papers, pamphlets and books on the subject and are weary of the platitudes of their authors and distortion of facts. We have written as we see the facts and are indebted to no one but our own conscience quickened by the rich revolutionary heritage of historical epochs.

The point of view maintained in this pamphlet stands in an uncompromising opposition to all colonial policies. It exposes the inherent contradictions between (i) colonial labour and capital investments in the colonies, between (ii) the financial monopolist combines and the imperialist powers in their unquenchable thirst for colonies and the national aspirations of the colonial peoples, and between (iii) the stated policies of the colonial governments and the practical application of these policies in the colonial areas.

Those who formulate the colonial issue in accordance with the false point of view of colonial powers, who are deluded by the futile promises of 'preparing' colonial peoples for 'self-government', who feel that their imperialist oppressors are 'rational' and 'moral' and will relinquish their 'possessions' if only confronted with the truth of the injustice of colonialism are tragically mistaken. Imperialism knows no law beyond its own interests.

KWAME NERUMAH

London,
October, 1947.

INTRODUCTION

Colonial existence under imperialist conditions necessitates a fierce and constant struggle for emancipation from the yoke of colonialism and exploitation. The aim of all colonial governments in Africa and elsewhere has been the struggle for raw materials; and not only this, but the colonies have become the dumping ground, and colonial peoples the false recipients, of manufactured goods of the industrialists and capitalists of Great Britain, France, Belgium and other colonial powers who turn to the dependent territories which feed their industrial plants. This is colonialism in a nutshell.

The basis of colonial territorial dependence is economic, but the basis of the solution of the problem is political. Hence political independence is an indispensable step towards securing economic emancipation. This point of view irrevocably calls for an alliance of all colonial territories and dependencies. All provincial and tribal differences should be broken down completely. By operating on tribal differences and colonial provincialism, the colonial powers' age-long policy of 'divide and rule' has been enhanced, while the colonial national independence movement has been obstructed and bamboozled. The effort of colonial peoples to end colonial exploitation demands the eager and earnest collaboration of all of them. They must bring into its service all their energies, physical, mental, economic and political.

Beneath the 'humanitarian' and 'appeasement' shibboleths of colonial governments, a proper scrutiny leads one to discover nothing but deception, hypocrisy, oppression and exploitation. Such expressions as 'colonial charter', 'trusteeship', 'partnership', 'guardianship', 'international colonial commission', 'dominion status', 'condominium', 'freedom from fear of permanent subjection', 'constitutional reform' and other shabby sham gestures of setting up a fake machinery for 'gradual evolution towards self-government' are means to cover the eyes of colonial peoples with the veil of imperialist chicanery. But the eyes of colonial peoples are beginning to see the light of day and are awakening to the true meaning of colonial policies. China discovered it; India has discovered it; Burma, Netherlands East Indies, French Indo-China, the Caribbean Islands and Africa are awakening to such a discovery.

The idea that Britain, France or any other colonial power is holding colonies under 'trusteeship' until, in their opinion, the colonies become 'capable' of self-government is erroneous and misconceived. Colonial powers cannot afford to expropriate themselves. And then to imagine that these colonial powers will hand freedom and independence to their colonies on a silver platter without compulsion is the height of folly.

Let us take for example, Britain.* In an attempt to reconcile the inherent contradictions within her capitalistic economy, she has two courses only left to keep her home population from starvation; either her population must be dispersed in the colonial territories, or she must guarantee subsistence to them by exploitation of the colonies. The former, if put into action, will ultimately necessitate agitation for dominion status or no less than independence by the white settlers, as was the case in colonial America or in the Union of South Africa. Such a step may also lead to 'race' conflict between the settlers and the aborigines, as is now the case in the Union of South

* I have made constant reference to Britain and her relation to her African colonies not because she is an isolated case but because she is the greatest colonial power of modern times. Although I have concentrated on colonial Africa, the thesis of the pamphlet applies to colonial areas everywhere.

Africa. The latter is 'natural', since Britain or any other colonial power depends on the exports of her manufactured goods and the cheap imports of raw materials.

The colonies are thus a source of raw materials and cheap labour, and a 'dumping ground' for spurious surplus goods to be sold at exorbitant prices. Therefore these colonies become avenues for capital investments, not for the benefit and development of the colonial peoples, but for the benefit of the investors, whose agents are the governments concerned. That is why it is incoherent nonsense to say that Britain or any other colonial power has the 'good intention' of developing her colonies for self-government and independence. The only thing left for the colonial peoples to do is to obtain their freedom and independence from these colonial powers.

Whatever camouflage colonial governments may decide upon, be it in the form of appeasements cloaked in 'constitutional reforms' or the 'Pan Africanism'* of Jan Smuts, there is only one road, the road of the national liberation movement, to colonial independence. It cannot come through delegations, gifts, charity, paternalism, grants, concessions, proclamations, charters or reformism, but only through the complete change of the colonial system, a united effort to unscramble the whole colonial egg of the last hundred years, a complete break of the colonial dependencies from their 'mother countries' and the establishment of their complete independence.

I: COLONIALISM AND IMPERIALISM

The basic driving force today is economic, and economics are at the root of other types of imperialism. However, there have been three fundamental doctrines in the philosophical analysis of imperialism: (a) the doctrine of exploitation; (b) the doctrine of 'trusteeship' or

* This plan proposes to group the various colonial territories of the several powers in Africa into loose geographical regions. Each group of territories would be covered by a central Regional Council on which would sit representatives of the various powers possessing colonies in that respective zone. In addition to these, there will be also representatives of other powers having only strategic commercial interests in that area, sitting in that council.

Behind Jan Smuts' regional plan (condominium) is a conscious drive for wider markets for the output of raw commodity interests which the war had inaugurated and expanded in the colonial areas. It is a subterfuge attempt to give assistance to the annexationist powers to exploit Africa on a wider scale. It offers ample opportunities for colonial annexations for which the anachronistic mandate system has already paved the way.

'partnership' (to use its contemporary counterpart); and (c) the doctrine of 'assimilation'. The exponents of these doctrines believe implicitly and explicitly in the right of stronger peoples to exploit weaker ones to develop world resources, and 'civilize' backward peoples against their will.

In general, imperialism is the policy which aims at creating, organizing and maintaining an empire. In other words, it is a state, vast in size, composed of various distinct national units, and subject to a single, centralized power or authority. This is the conception of empire: divers peoples brought together by force under a common power. It goes back to the idea of Alexander the Great with his Graeco-Asiatic empire. He conquered the then known world, and sat down and wept because he had no more territory to conquer. The imperialism of Julius Caesar needs no comment here. Modern imperialism, however, must be distinguished from that of the ancients exemplified by Caesar and Alexander the Great. Neither the Norman conquest nor the annexations of Frederick the Great, nor the expansions of the American pioneers into the western plains can be called imperialism, but the annexation of one nation or state by another and the application of a superior technological strength by one nation for the subjugation and the economic exploitation of a people or another nation constitutes outright imperialism.

Colonialism is, therefore, the policy by which the 'mother country', the colonial power, binds her colonies to herself by political ties with the primary object of promoting her own economic advantages. Such a system depends on the opportunities offered by the natural resources of the colonies and the uses for them suggested by the dominant economic objectives of the colonial power. Under the influence of national aggressive self-consciousness and the belief that in trade and commerce one nation should gain at the expense of the other, and the further belief that exports must exceed imports in value, each colonial power pursues a policy of strict monopoly of colonial trade, and the building up of national power. The basic notion, that of strict political and economic control, governs the colonial policies of Britain, France, Belgium and other modern colonial powers.

The dominant reasons for the quest for colonies* and particularly

* The term colony originally meant a transplanted organized group of people settling in a foreign land. In the political sense, a colony is either a settlement of the subjects of a nation or state beyond its frontiers, or a territorial unit geographically separated from, but owing allegiance to, it. Thus modern colonial history exhibits two types of colonies: a settlement colony and an exploitation colony. A settlement colony is one in which the the penetration into Africa by European capitalist powers were stated by Jules Ferry, the master of imperialistic logic, in a statement made by him in 1885 in the Chamber of Deputies while speaking in defence of the colonial policy of the government of France, of which he was then the Premier. Ferry said: 'The nations of Europe desire colonies for the following three purposes: (i) in order that they may have access to the raw materials of the colonies; (ii) in order to have markets for sale of the manufactured goods of the home country; and (iii) as a field for the investment of surplus capital.'

Albert Sarraut, Colonial Secretary of State for France in 1923, at the École Coloniale, Paris, said: 'What is the use of painting the truth? At the start, colonization was not an act of civilization, was not a desire to civilize. It was an act of force motivated by interests. An episode in the vital competition which, from man to man, from group to group, has gone on ever-increasing; the people who set out for taking and making of colonies in distant continents are thinking primarily only of themselves, and are working only for their own power, and conquering for their own profits.' Sarraut concluded his speech with these words, and thus exposed the falsehood of the 'white man's burden', and the 'mission civilisatrice' policy in colonization: 'The origin of colonization is nothing else than enterprise of individual interests, a one-sided and egotistical imposition of the strong upon the weak.' Such is the phenomenon of European capitalist aggressiveness, one which has been rightly termed 'colonial imperialism'.

Our best illustration is the 'scramble for Africa', which began when the economic insufficiency of Great Britain, France, Germany, Spain, Portugal, Belgium and Italy impelled their political leaders to look beyond the seas for markets and storehouses of wealth and resources in order to consolidate their individual states and guarantee their economic security.

In 1881 France extended her colonial sway over Tunis and, the year following, Britain secured control over Egypt. In 1884 the first German colony was established at Angra Pequena Bay in South-West Africa. The occupation of Togoland and Cameroons in West Africa followed. The spectacular advent of Germany as a colonial power provoked the jealousy of France. A French force was geographical and racial environment is not very different from that of the 'mother country', while an exploitation colony consists typically of groups of business men, monopolist combines, cartels, trusts, administrators, soldiers and missionaries - all of which are thrust and dumped into conditions and environment quite different from their home country.

despatched to seize the unoccupied territory between the Cameroons and the Portuguese colony of Angola. This became the French Congo. In 1894 the tricolour was raised over Timbuktu, Dahomey and the Ivory Coast. The whole of the western Sudan was soon under French occupation. In 1885 a protectorate was established over Madagascar.

Then ensued the Anglo-French colonial jealousy which culminated in a crisis in 1898 when the occupation of the Sudanese port of Fashoda threatened to upset Britain's colonial annexations within that area. France withdrew and the Eastern Sudan came under the control of Britain.

France then began to make advance towards the conquest of Morocco. Such action contravened the intention of Germany. A dispute between France and Germany arose which resulted in the calling of a conference of the colonial powers at Algeria, in 1905, which left Morocco open to the penetration of all the other nations. But the right of France and Spain was recognized as a sort of joint protectorate over Morocco. In 1911 Germany raised further colonial claims and succeeded in buying a slice of the French Congo.

Italy felt herself cheated of a possible field of expansion by the moves of Britain and France. This was one of the results of the formation of the Triple Alliance. A colonial rush to secure some parts of Africa now took place. In 1882 Italy occupied Assab, and three years later Massawa was taken. In 1898 Italian Somaliland was formed into a colony. Abyssinians revolted and the battle of Adowa ensued. Italy was defeated.

In 1876 the International African Association was formed under the direction of Leopold II, King of Belgium, for the occupation of the Congo Basin. In 1885 at a conference held in Berlin, Leopold obtained permission of the other colonial powers to erect these Belgian settlements into a 'Congo Free State' under his 'protection'. The cruel treatment meted out by the Belgians to the Africans in the colonies is a common story in colonial exploitation.

Thus Africa became not only the market for European goods but a field for capital investments. As British, German, French and European industry was organized the products were divided between the entrepreneur and the capitalists, who got salaries and dividends at the expense of the African labourer.

The bankers of the European colonial powers had surplus capital to invest in competition with one another. To protect these investments they reduced the colonies to exploited subject status. It was circumstances like this that led to the rebellion of Egypt under Arabi

Pasha. While the French hesitated, Great Britain crushed the revolt and thus Egypt became a British colony. Briefly, then, imperialism in Africa was a direct answer for the capitalists, bankers and financiers of the colonial powers to the problem of how to accrue for themselves super profits from their foreign investments.

The fate of the colonies changes in accordance with the results of European imperialist wars. After the first World War (1914), Great Britain received German East Africa, a quarter of Togoland and a piece of the Cameroons. France took over the remaining three-quarters of Togoland and a greater part of the Cameroons, while Belgium and Portugal got slices of German East Africa. The Union of South Africa received German South-West Africa.

Thus present day partitioning of Africa falls into the following colonial regions:

- I. NORTH AFRICA, includes: (1) Rio de Oro (Spanish); (2) Morocco (French); (3) Algeria (French); (4) Tunisia (French); (5) Libya (formerly Italian); (6) Egypt (independent); (7) Anglo-Egyptian Sudan (British).
- II. EAST AFRICA, includes: (1) Kenya (British); (2) Uganda (British); (3) Tanganyika (British); (4) Nyasaland (British); (5) Portuguese East Africa; (6) Abyssinia (Independent); (7) The Somalilands (British, French, Italian).
- III. SOUTH AFRICA,* includes: (1) The Union of South Africa (European rule) and the mandated territories of South-West Africa.
- IV. WEST AFRICA, includes: (1) Senegal (French); (2) Ivory Coast (French); (3) Portuguese Guinea; (4) French Sudan; (5) Liberia (Independent); (6) Dahomey (French); (7) French Equatorial Africa; (8) Belgian Congo; (9) The Cameroons (British and French); (10) Angola (Portuguese); (11) Gambia (British); (12) Sierra Leone (British); (13) The Gold Coast (British); (14) Togoland (French mandate); (15) Nigeria (British).

* Nearly seven million Africans, almost three-fourths of the entire population of the Union of South Africa, possess less than twenty per cent of the total area of the Union. They are by law denied the right of acquiring more land either by purchase or by other means. Regardless of qualification, they are deprived of the right to vote in the regular parliamentary elections and are constitutionally denied the right to become members of the Union Parliament. Further, they are gravely limited in their right to organize, form trade unions, in their right to strike, to move about freely, to buy land to trade, to acquire education, and to aspire to full citizenship in their own country.

Since we feel that mercantilism – as an aspect of imperialism is – the basis of colonial economics, a brief history of the term is essential here. Mercantilism is a term applied to the economic policy which had its inception in Europe just at the close of the Middle Ages. In fact, it was the next historical development of feudalism. Its doctrine, in the extreme sense, made wealth and money identical; but as the years rolled on mercantile economists based the definition of the system on money exclusively. Money was therefore regarded as the main object of a community. Thus it was held that the community must confine itself to dealing with other nations on such lines as would attract the most possible precious metals to itself. This method of trade among nations led to what is known in the realm of economics as the 'balance of trade', which meant the relationship of equilibrium between export and import.

Eventually, this system of 'balance of trade' was considered favourable when more money was received into the country than was paid out. To assure a favourable balance of trade, governments of nations resorted to certain economic and political expedients. For instance: (i) high duties on imports; (ii) exports of home manufactured goods; (iii) receiving only raw materials from other countries; (iv) restrictions on the exports of precious metals; (v) exaltation of foreign trade over domestic trade; (vi) organizing of industries and factories at home; (vii) the importance of dense population as an element of national strength to safeguard foreign trade, and last but not least; (viii) the employment of state action in furthering such ends.

Governments took great interest in these mercantile programmes because they needed money and men for the maintenance of the army and for the unification of their national states. Thus statesmen and business aristocracy conjectured that for them to further their political and economic ambitions successfully, industries and the mercantile system must prosper. Eventually, this conception of trade led to the great problem of colonization.

The purpose of founding colonies was mainly to secure raw materials. To safeguard the measures for securing such raw materials the following policies were indirectly put into action: (i) to make the colonies non-manufacturing dependencies; (ii) to prevent the colonial subjects from acquiring the knowledge of modern means and techniques for developing their own industries; (iii) to make colonial 'subjects' simple producers of raw materials through cheap labour; (iv) to prohibit the colonies from trading with other nations except through the 'mother country'. The methods employed by the imperialists today are developments of mercantilism.

Colonial economics may be traced through three main phases corresponding to its history. The mercantile period, the free-trade period and the period of economic imperialism, all being respectively dominated by merchant capital, industrial capital and finance capital. We are here mainly concerned with the last phase, economic imperialism with its dominance of finance capital.

The most searching and penetrating analysis of economic imperialism has been given by Marx and Lenin. According to the Marx-Lenin point of view, economic imperialism is not only the natural stage in the development of the capitalist system, but its highest stage in which the inner contradictions and inconsistencies of the system foreshadow its doom and demolition.

The Marxist-Leninist position may be stated thus: In the capitalist system of production labour is treated as a commodity to be bought and sold in the market like any other commodity. As such, it figures in the capitalist-producer's calculations merely as one production cost among others. But since the system is a competitive system, the capitalist-producer is compelled to keep wages down in order to keep the margin of profit high. Here it becomes obvious that the economic philosophy of high wages, even though it may operate well in special industries whose circumstances favour a combination of high wages with low wage-costs per unit of production, cannot under capitalism be applied to industry as a whole. This means that under the capitalist system of production a point is soon reached where wages appear a necessary evil even to the capitalist-producer, who now realizes that the incomes distributed as wages form the body of the market for what he wants to sell. And since competition and the necessity of profit determine the outlook of capitalism, it cannot raise incomes 'up to the limits of productive capacity'.

The capitalist-producer, in seeking profit by limiting his wage bill, impedes his own effort to find buyers for the increasing volume of his production.

This dilemma becomes even more confounded by the introduction of combines and monopolies due to the fact that these combines and monopolies continue to compete with other combines and monopolies producing similar commodities in other countries. Thus complete elimination of competition from the capitalist system of production is not only a contradiction but an impossibility.

To find a way out of this contradiction the capitalist-producer turns his profit-seeking eyes to the colonies and dependent territories. He does so first by killing the arts and crafts in these areas through the competition of his cheaper machine-made goods (exports) and, secondly, by thrusting capital loans upon them for financing the construction of railways, harbours and other means of transportation and communication in so far as these constructions cater to his profits and safeguard his capital. Industrial capital thus fuses with finance capital.

It is when the number of the capitalist countries relying on foreign markets and fields of investment increases and the number of colonizable areas diminishes that rivalries among the colonial powers ensue, rivalries which issue first in minor wars of colonial conquests and later in the great imperialist wars of modern times. Lenin in his Imperialism the Highest Stage of Capitalism, summarizes the position thus:

Imperialism is capitalism in that stage of development in which the domination of monopolies and finance capital has taken shape; in which the export of capital has acquired pronounced importance; in which the division of the world by the international trusts has begun, and in which the partition of all the territory of the earth by the greatest capitalist countries has been completed.

The effect of this type of imperialism on colonial peoples is dramatic. The stage opens with the appearance of missionaries and anthropologists, traders and concessionaires, and administrators. While 'missionaries' with 'Christianity' perverted implore the colonial subject to lay up his 'treasures in Heaven where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt', the traders and concessionaires and administrators acquire his mineral and land resources, destroy his arts, crafts and home industries. Since the rise of colonial industry would entail more competition and undercutting, these finance-capital-producers and their imperialist cohorts do everything in their power to prevent its development.

Economic development in the colonial areas is perverted precisely because the monopoly stage, which should come as a logical advanced feature of capitalism, is introduced before even the most primitive manifestation of local capitalist development. Hence the stagnation and decay characteristic of colonial economy.

But the introduction of capitalism into the colonies does not take the 'normal' course it took in western countries. Free competition does not exist, and monopoly control of all resources of the colonies demonstrates the perversion of finance capitalism. It is canalized to suit the monopolist combines and investors. The finance capitalist and investor find the easiest and richest profits not from establishing industry in the colonies, which would compete with home industries and necessitate a drastic rise in wages and a high standard of living in order to create a purchasing power formidable enough to render increased production possible, but by exhausting the natural and mineral resources of the colonies, and by considering their human resources just as another commodity to be used and thrown away.

This brings us to the question: what is the relationship between the monopolist, non-industrial economy engineered by the colonial powers in the colonies and the migrant labour system? Briefly and precisely, it is this: that the concentration of large bodies of colonial labourers in constant contact with realities of the most repressive and degrading conditions of life, leads to the creation of a class-conscious working class which is in a position to defend itself against its oppressors. At all costs the finance capitalist must prevent the formation of such a class-conscious group in order to prevent his destruction. This is the reason why colonial workers are recruited and forcibly broken up and disbanded every year by their capitalist exploiters, and compelled to retire to their homes and villages where capitalist exploitation is indirectly exercised through corrupted 'warrant' chiefs and a politically sold intelligentsia. Thus, resentment against the foreign capitalist oppressors is arrested, and conditions for mass organization against them aborted.

Take Britain, for instance, and see what she does in her African colonies. She controls exports of raw materials from the colonies by preventing direct shipment by her colonial 'subjects' to foreign markets, in order that, after satisfying the demands of her home industries, she can sell the surplus to other nations, netting huge super-profits for herself.

The colonial farmer-producer has no share in these profits. The question may be raised to the effect that the colonial powers utilize part of these profits for public works, health projects and 'loans'. The fact generally forgotten is that such 'loans' come from taxing the colonial 'subjects', and the profit gotten from their produce and mineral resources, and the greater part of these very loans is used in paying European officials in the colonies.

A recent White Paper* released by the Colonial Office reveals a fabulous profit of £3,676,253 sterling netted by the British Government from exploitation of 800,000 families of West African colonial cocoa farmers. This is how it was done: A Cocoa Control Board was established by, and was responsible to, the Colonial Office, and acting as 'trustees' for the West African cocoa farmers, it was empowered to purchase the total production of cocoa, and to prescribe the prices to be paid to the farmers; and, not only this, but the board was also responsible for the general disposal of cocoa from the colonies. The Board, during the period from 1939-1943, squeezed out the aforesaid profit - a profit not shared by the colonial farmers. Such profits resulted from the fact that the cocoa for which the African farmer received one and one-fourth pence (two and one-half cents) a pound brought four pence (eight cents) and four and one-half (nine cents) a pound in London and New York, respectively. In short, while the African peasants' cost of living and demands on his labour were increasing, and his income falling, the monopolist chocolate combines were reaping super-profits.

* Cmd. 6554. H.M. Stationery Office, London.

We learned also of a fund called 'Aid for Colonial Development and Welfare', which provides £120,000,000 sterling in grants to the colonies. A little arithmetical reflection, however, shows that when the population of the colonial empire is taken into consideration the amount works out at eighteen pence (thirty-six cents) per inhabitant per year. During the first year and a half after the passage of the said Act the amount spent was two pence (four cents) per inhabitant per year. Nor is this all. The benefits of the Colonial Development Fund are largely illusory, since the £120,000,000 is not in the safe keeping of a Bank of the British Empire as such where any colonial territory can apply for the money it may need for its 'welfare development'. To simplify the issue: supposing, say, Nigeria needs £40,000 for its 'welfare development', the British Government in Nigeria then goes to Barclays Bank, which advances the £40,000 to the people of Nigeria at six per cent interest. On this basis the people of the 'colony' of Nigeria eventually find themselves in perpetual debt to the very agencies which are supposed to be concerned with their 'welfare development'. It is a common economic experience that wherever there is economic dependence there is no freedom.

The policy underlying the economic situation in the colonies is that of monopoly control forcing the farmer and peasant to accept low fixed prices by eliminating open competition, and forcing the same colonial farmer and peasant consumer to buy at high fixed prices. Marketing of produce and manufactured goods in the British West African colonies, for instance, is done by the European merchants, through a 'pool' system.

As a result of the operations of this monopolist combine and the mining companies, with the aid of their agency, the government, gold and money leave the country, and consequently no local capital is left in the colonies. Industrial and commercial aspirations and growth on the part of the colonial subjects is thus arrested; wages drop, and the colonial 'subject' finds it impossible to acquire capital of any sort for any business enterprise; and worse than this, whether as a wage earner or as a peasant, he is always in debt due to the fact that when he buys the manufactured goods he loses, and when he sells his produce he loses; and the colonial government sees that he remains in perpetual debt by further taxing him. The colonial subject is thus economically strangled by his very 'trustees' who are supposed to prepare him for self-government.

Furthermore, the colonial subject cannot go into any form of business and succeed because the wholesale prices charged by the monopolist combines leave him no margin of profits. And this in addition to the secret arrangements between the combines and the manufacturers makes it impossible for him to buy directly from the manufacturers. No matter how large an order he gives them, he is always referred to the local agents, who are members of the powerful monopolist combines.

Since the advent of capitalism into the colonies colonial peoples have been reduced to the level of labourers and contract bondsmen, and are unable to organize effectively due to government and monopolist combine interference. The philosophy of European capitalism in the colonies is that colonial subjects should labour under any foreign government with uncomplaining satisfaction. They are supposedly 'incapable' of developing the resources of their own country, and are taught to labour and appreciate European manufactured goods so as to become 'good' customers. The meagre stipend given to them as a wage by the European capitalists is spent on spurious imported manufactured goods, the only kind they get. Curiously enough, the same coin that is given to the 'native' as a wage by his exploiter eventually returns to the pocket of that wily exploiter.

The slogan 'buy British and trade imperial' is used to stimulate the maintenance of higher prices for British manufactured goods. 'Preferential tariff' (higher customs duties and low quotas) are applied on foreign manufactured goods. However, American goods are given much higher quotas than Japanese manufactured goods. In spite of the preferential duty the Japanese continued to produce cheaper goods and to export them to British colonies. In order to freeze the importation of cheaper-priced Japanese goods, the local governments of the British colonies, agents of British monopolist combines and industrialists, continued to raise the tariff on the Japanese goods and finally froze them out. This underlies the denunciation of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty of 1934.

Tariffs are usually applied to protect domestic economy, but this is not so in the colonies. For there tariffs are applied for the protection of British trade and profits since the colonies do not manufacture their own goods. The same preferential tariff that protects the imports of British manufactured goods also protects the produce and raw materials of the colonies (exports) against shipment to foreign countries except through British agencies. This is done to ensure much higher prices and therefore huge profits for the combines and companies. This is what we term the two-way fixed price system, basic in colonial economics. The object of this system is to buy cheap raw materials and labour from the colonies and to sell high-priced manufactured goods back to the colonies. It is the colonial peasants who suffer most considerably from this evil system. This again goes to prove that as long as colonial powers are able to keep the colonies under this economic system (importing only manufactured goods and exporting only raw materials and produce) colonial subjects will not progress to any notable extent and will always remain poverty stricken with a sub-normal standard of living.

That is one of the reasons why we maintain that the only solution to the colonial problem is the complete eradication of the entire economic system of colonialism, by colonial peoples, through their gaining political independence. Political freedom will open the way for the attainment of economic and social improvement and advancement. It must be otherwise under foreign rule.

THE LAND QUESTION

The alienation to Europeans of enormous tracts of land which were once available for African use, and the consequent rise of an alien absentee land interest, a class of European settlers and concessionaires, intent on raising the money value of their holdings and on acquiring political ascendancy as a means to that end, is the basic trend in the colonial land question.

The African is robbed of most of his lands, through legal extortion and forced concession. In the West African colonies, for example, where there is no personal private ownership of land, for all land belongs to some clan or tribe, the personal ownership of land always develops whenever colonial powers have disregarded the African land-tenure system in favour of their own. For while agriculture, in its rude and infant stage, is primarily the 'affair' of the African clan or tribe, the mining and large plantations are entirely in the hands of the suzerain power itself or of foreign industrialists and capitalists.

The land question, like any other colonial question, is handled by the colonial powers in such a way as to yield maximum profits for their mining and plantation investments. In order to confiscate the land of colonial subjects certain devices are used. We enumerate the following, using British land confiscating tactics as a typical example.

(1) Britain, by certain 'legal' enactments, has secured direct and indirect ownership, control and possession of the land of colonies and protectorates. The Foreign Jurisdiction Act of 1890 is a good example of these 'legal' enactments. This Act contains the declaration that 'however the powers of the Crown might have been acquired, whether by treaty, grant, usage or other lawful means, its jurisdiction is as ample as if it had been derived from the cession or conquest of territory.' This abrogates her treaty relations with her colonies and gives her sole possession, outright ownership, of the colonies. Hence it becomes a mockery to speak of colonial lands as belonging to the colonial 'subjects', who only possess 'surface rights' when valuable minerals are found on such lands. Other colonial powers have also used similar enactments for the purpose of confiscating the colonial lands under their control.

(2) 'Ordinances' are passed to further the confiscating and exploiting effect. These 'ordinances' cause certain areas to be roped off for afforestation. These areas contain valuable mineral wealth. Thus, afforestation is simply the mask to delude the colonial people. However, the lands that are wanted for urgent profits, mining and plantation, are claimed outright by the 'Land Office' for the Crown. The onus probandi of ownership rests upon the rightful owner, the colonial 'subject', who suffers here because his ancestors were not required to register their lands.

(3) Ninety-year leases are drawn up and forced upon the colonial subjects by 'provincial commissioners', agents of the colonial powers. These leases grant concessions to private companies for exploiting the land and the mines. In some instances meagre and inadequate rentals are paid for the concessions of the land. This is an indirect method of the British of seizing land 'legally'. The French method of confiscating land differs from the British in that they make no pretence of seizure through 'legal' means but seize the land outright.

In East and South Africa the other European powers also use the 'outright seizure' method.*

(4) The latest development in the colonial land confiscating programme is the enactment of military defence acts, by which land in the colonies is being confiscated for ultimate use of the colonial and other capitalistic powers concerned.

3: COLONIAL POLICIES: THEORY AND PRACTICE

Within the African continent there are different types of dependent areas: colonies, protectorates and mandates. In the British West African colonies, for example, each colony is under the direct control and administration† of the Colonial Office through its representative, the governor, who is also the Commander-in-Chief and Vice-Admiral of the colony and protectorate.

* In February, 1944, the Governor of Nigeria, in spite of strong opposition, passed a bill through the local legislature giving the British Government in Nigeria the right to take possession of all minerals discovered on land in the possession of Africans. This obnoxious law strikes at the very foundation of the West African land tenure system.

Under the Ashanti Concessions Ordinances of 1903, mineral rights in the Gold Coast remain with African authorities, but negotiations in connection with concessions are supervised by European District Commissioners and the British Government in the Gold Coast has control of all money derived from the sales. The concessions are not worked on a royalty basis, but at a fixed rental, very often as low as £50, and nowhere exceeding £400 per year.

† In the administration and legislation of colonial possession by the colonial powers, three basic principles may be distinguished:

(1) Most of the legislation for the colonies is enacted in the 'Mother Country' through her home legislative organ. Other supplementary legislation is enacted in the legislative councils of the colonies, the head of which is the governor, appointed by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. The governor is endowed with veto powers and is subject to no one but the government of the 'Mother Country'.

(2) Under the second type of colonial administration most of the legislation is supposed to be enacted by the colony itself. However, both the executive and the legislative councils in the colony are under strict and direct control of the all-powerful governor of the colony.

(3) The third system provides creation of a representative legislative body in the colony with official members appointed by the governor and unofficial members supposed to be elected by the people of the colony. The official members are in the majority and represent heads of the various governmental and commercial concerns.

Under these systems it is impossible to vote the 'government' out of office. In reality the legislative power rests basically with the parliaments of the 'Mother Countries'. In Great Britain this is justified by so-called 'royal prerogative', which allows the King to enact legislation for the colonial possessions. These systems also deliberately prevent and curb any aspirations towards independence on the part of the colonial peoples. In fact, such administrative systems are not only the embodiment of colonial chaos and political confusion but definitely nullify the ideas of true democracy.

Although colonial rules have drawn distinction between a colony and a protectorate, there is practically no difference of any legal validity between them in the international position.

The mandates were created after the First World War, when the former German territories in Africa were placed under the League of Nations. The underlying philosophy common to all mandates is the principle that the 'well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilization'. The mandate system is a feeble and dangerous compromise between Wilsonian idealism, self-determination and the concept of trusteeship, on the one hand, and annexationists' ambition, political subjugation and economic exploitation, on the other. In other words, it is a cowardly compromise between the principle of self-determination for dependent territories and imperialism. It becomes nothing but a useful tool in the hands of the powers to whom the territories are mandated in order to carry out their intentions and to perpetuate the economic exploitation of these territories by a combination of colonial powers. The same consequences will follow if the newly-proposed international supervision of the dependent territories is carried out.

The doctrine of 'trusteeship' is supposed to be more humanitarian in its significance and approach than that of exploitation. It is the fundamental factor underlying the system of 'dual mandate', exponents of which think that exploitation involves a sacred duty towards the exploited peoples. The colonial subjects must be exploited and 'civilized', but, in doing so, their 'rights' must be 'respected' and 'protected'. The philosophy underlying this doctrine reminds us of an African saying that a mouse biting at the feet of its victim blows cool air from its mouth and nostrils on the spot to mitigate the pain it is inflicting. In other words, exploit the colonial peoples, but be cunning enough not to let them know that you are doing so. There are abundant proofs that the primary motives underlying the quest for colonies and the present administrative and economic policies of the colonial powers are rooted in economic exploitation and not in humanitarianism.

The Conference of Berlin (1890), the Treaty of Versailles, the Covenant of the League of Nations, and the Trusteeship System of UNO, each and every one of these pacts contained provisions 'to protect and guard' colonial peoples. These provisions, however, were adopted to camouflage the economic philosophy of colonial powers so as to exploit with impunity. The material development - railways, roads bridges, schools, hospitals - which are noticeable in the colonies have been merely accidental adjuncts to facilitate economic exploitation of the colonies.

The colonial powers build hospitals because if the health of the colonial subjects is not taken care of it will not only jeopardize their own health but will diminish the productive power of the colonial labourer. They build schools in order to satisfy the demand for clerical activities and occupations for foreign commercial and mercantile concerns. The roads they build lead only to the mining and plantation centres. In short, any humanitarian act of any colonial power towards the 'ward' is merely to enhance its primary objective: economic exploitation. If it were not so, why haven't the West African colonies, for instance, been given the necessary training that provides for complete political and economic independence?

The attitude of Britain, France, Spain, Italy and other colonial powers towards what they call 'participation' by colonial peoples in colonial government and public affairs are half-way measures to keep them complacent and to throttle their aspiration for complete independence.

The principal difference between French and British colonial policies is that the former stands for 'assimilation', a centralized government with uniform policy decided upon in Paris, and considering the French colonies as almost a part of France, emphasizing the use of the French language and drawing a line of distinction between a limited élite (notables évolués) with many privileges, and the teeming ignorant masses in her colonies: the latter, on the other hand, stands for decentralization and disunity in her colonial areas; emphasis is on 'indirect rule', the encouragement of 'Africans to remain Africans'. It pretends to build up African culture, folkways, art and 'civilization' and to adjust the character of government to the special needs of different tribes and groups, systematic application of the 'divide and rule' policy, and the exhibition of scientific exploitation through 'practical anthropology'. Yet, paradoxically enough, the full growth of industry in the colonies is arrested by the British.

Taking into account all of the arguments in favour of these colonial policies and the fact that the actual conditions in the colonies are not in harmony with the stated theories of colonial rule, and because such harmony is impossible, it will not be incorrect to say that democracy, self-determination, independence and self-government are incompatible with the doctrines of 'trusteeship', 'partnership', and 'assimilation'. Indirect rule, 'native administration' policies, social projects, agricultural planning, facilities for 'full participation' in government, condominium, regionalism and dominion status merely serve as means to one end: the perpetuation of foreign rule upon colonial peoples and the economic exploitation of their material resources and manpower for the benefit of the so-called 'mother countries'.

We therefore repeat that only the united movement of the colonial people, determined to assert its right to independence, can compel any colonial power to lay down its 'white man's burden', which rests heavily upon the shoulders of the so-called 'backward' peoples, who have been subjugated, humiliated, robbed and degraded to the level of cattle.

4: APOLOGY FOR APOLOGETICS

In the foregoing pages we have given the picture of the colonial situation as it exists and have demonstrated and exposed the contradictions between theories and practices of colonial rule. But before we make any suggestion as to what must be done for the liberation of the colonies we want to point out briefly the futility in the points of view advanced by some colonial and non-colonial writers in reference to the freedom and independence of the West African colonies. They speak of 'internal self-government' and gradual evolution to membership of the 'British Commonwealth'.

The stubborn fact these people fail to realize is that the imperialist governments stand for political and economic domination, no matter under what mask, 'democracy' or what not, and therefore will never give colonial subjects equal status with other dominions such as the Union of South Africa, Australia, New Zealand and Canada within the British Commonwealth of Nations. They forget that the British dominions are all in league with the financial oligarchy of Great Britain for the exploitation of the colonies, and utterly fail to see the intimate connections between political domination and economic exploitation. They apparently ignore the fact that such steps as they propose in asking for gradual withdrawal of the political administration are in effect asking the 'mother country' to expropriate herself. Isn't economic exploitation the driving force and basic principle of colonization? Dominion status carries with it certain political as well as economic advantages which the 'mother country' is determined to deny the colonial dependencies. In considering the colonial question it is necessary to have a clear-cut distinction between those colonies of the capitalist countries which have served them as colonizing regions for their surplus population, and which in this way have become a continuation of their capitalist system (e.g. Australia, Canada, New Zealand, South Africa, etc.), and those colonies which are exploited by the imperialists primarily as sources of raw materials and cheap labour, as spheres for export of capital, and as markets for their manufactured goods and commodities. Our colonial apologists and social-democratic reformists, who advocate 'self-government' and 'dominion status' as the solution to the colonial problem, fail to realize that this distinction has not only a historic but also a great economic, social and political significance. They fail to grasp the essential point, that capitalist development reproduces among the population of the imperialist countries the class structure of the metropolis (i.e. the imperial centre or 'Mother Country') while the indigenous native population of the colonial territories are either exploited, subjugated or exterminated. In the dominions, not only do the capitalists present the colonial extension of the capitalism and imperialism of the mother countries, but their colonial interests, directly or indirectly, coincide. That is why the term 'self-government', 'dominion status', or what the French imperialists now call autonomie, are nothing but blinds and limitations in the way of the struggle of the national liberation movement in the colonies towards self-determination and complete national independence.

The reasons advanced for becoming members of the British Commonwealth of Nations, and remaining as such, is that if colonial 'subjects' sever connections with their 'mother country' they will not have enough protection to ward off other European aggressor nations. The situation is rather the reverse. For instance, whenever Britain is at war she has to call upon her colonies and dominions and other foreign powers to help defend herself. Not only does England need the help of her colonies, but in every case in the last war her deliberate policy of refusing to permit industrialization of the colonies has made them indefensible against modern mechanized warfare. Needless to call attention here as to how France depends upon her colonial troops for defence. The point of emphasis here is that, if left alone, the colonies are able to forge the weapons of defence which they are prevented from making in order to defend themselves successfully.

Another excuse offered by colonial apologists for their desire to hang on and act like the tail of the kite of the British Empire is that if colonial 'subjects' sever connections with the colonial powers it will hamper their scientific advancement. Britain and other colonial powers have been in Africa for over two centuries yet that continent is almost as technologically backward as when they found it. In fact they have arrested and stultified its growth. If Liberia and Abyssinia are still backward in technological advancement it is chiefly because European and other powers have wilfully limited their advancement through their financial and economic machinations.

The political and economic predicament of Liberia demonstrates the fact that unless there is a complete national unity of all the West African colonies it will be practically impossible for any one West African colony to throw off her foreign yoke. Russia and the United States of America are a conglomeration of different peoples and cultures, yet each has achieved political unity. Cultural and linguistic diversities are by no means inconsistent with political unity.

We are aware of the fact that blind nationalism is one of the weapons of aggression, of cut-throat competition, of imperialism and warfare, but we disagree with those who advocate no nationalism, 'the state of being a nation, a political unity'. The West African colonies, for example, must first unite and become a national entity, absolutely free from the encumbrances of foreign rule, before they can assume the aspect of international co-operation on a grand scale; for the wish to co-operate internationally presupposes independent political status. The Dumbarton Oaks Security Conference, the Bretton Woods Financial Conference, the San Francisco World Security Organization and the United Nations Organization support this contention. They all exclude any consideration of the colonies for independence now, and implicitly point out that the majority of mankind who form the inhabitants of the colonies are not entitled to human equality, except through the generosity of the colonial powers whose interest lies in preserving their power and income by means of exploitation of the colonies.

Such American organizations as the Council on African Affairs, the Committee on Africa, the War and Peace Aims, the Committee on African Studies, and the Special Research Council of the National Association for the Advancement of Coloured Peoples on Colonies and Peace, advocate the 'gradual evolution towards self-government' policy for colonial peoples through some sort of international colonial commission. The reason given is that the colonial peoples are 'unprepared' for independence now, as if the European monopoly interests, which, incidentally, rule the colonial powers as well as the colonies, can be persuaded to move out and give the colonies' natural wealth back to their peoples. Do these organizations expect these monopoly interests and their agents, the colonial governments, to expropriate themselves? The answer to this question is as self-evident as the ignorance with which most of these organizations claim that the 'gradual evolution towards self-government' policy is the solution to the colonial problem. Nevertheless, we understand their point of view, to the extent that they reject the colonial system and favour internal self-government, but we feel that they do not go far enough and express the fundamental aspirations of the masses of colonial peoples.

Let us remind our apologists of this occurrence: speaking in the United States of America, Colonel Oliver Stanley, Britain's erstwhile Secretary of State for the Colonies, declared that Britain's objective in colonial policy was the achievement of the fullest possible measure of self-government within the British Empire at some unknown future date, and added that it was 'British presence' alone which prevented 'disastrous disintegration in her colonies'. We grant Colonel Stanley this fact in a way. But it is the same supposedly altruistic 'British presence' that in 1929 mowed down by machine-gun fire poor defenceless Nigerian women for peacefully and harmlessly protesting against excessive taxation, the counterpart of India's Amritsar. Indeed, it is 'British presence' that has compelled poor African workers to toil day in and day out in mines and on plantations for a mere pittance of ninepence (18 cents) a day of over 10 working hours. It is 'British presence' that has persecuted and jailed and deported colonial labour leaders, only for having dared to organize labour in the colonies. It is 'British presence' that has brought war, oppression, poverty and disease and perpetuated mass illiteracy upon colonial peoples. It is 'British presence' that bleeds them white by brutal exploitation in order to feed the 'British lion' with red meat. These are the achievements of 'British presence' in the colonies. This is the 'disintegration' which 'British presence' is nobly preventing in the colonies.

When this same Oliver Stanley visited Nigeria, a British West

African colony, he told the Nigerian Press that Britain desires 'economic independence' for colonies before 'political independence'. The way to achieve this economic independence, according to his thinking, is for the Nigerian people to produce more cocoa, more palm oil, more cotton, more rubber, and more and more raw materials for the British manufacturers and industrialists, who, incidentally, pay for these raw materials at their own prices.

The practical demonstration of the way to hasten this 'economic independence' was a Bill presented to the British-dominated Legislative Council of Nigeria when it met on 5 March. The Bill provides for the British 'Crown' the ownership of all minerals in Nigeria, an eye-opener for those who advocate the 'gradual evolution towards self-government' policy, and wax so eloquently about the 'unpreparedness' of colonial peoples to govern themselves.

A 'Charter for Coloured Peoples' recommending uniform rights for colonial peoples, and submitted to the governments of the United Nations, has been rejected by the British Colonial Office on the ground that the British Government is directed to guiding and assisting the social, economic and political development of each territory according to its particular needs and capacities. What an astonishing hypocrisy! Of course, 'uniform rights' does not suit the British or 'Anglo-Saxon' taste of inferior status for colonial peoples.

It is often alleged that colonial peoples are not 'ripe' for independence. The facts of history not only contradict this allegation but repudiate it. The imperialist contention of 'unreadiness' for self-government is a blind, because the British imperialists are not taking serious steps to prepare the colonies for self-government; the direction is not towards self-government but towards Britain's economic self-aggrandizement. Under the colonial powers' 'tutelage' the colonies will never be 'ripe' for self-government. The reason is quite obvious.

The English, for instance, were living in a state of semi-barbarism when the Romans left them. But today it is a different story altogether. The Russians, thirty years ago, were almost as backward in modern western technology as colonial peoples, and had ninety-five per cent illiteracy, but are now one of the most powerful people of Europe. The Latin American Republics have considerable illiteracy and are not as economically advanced as other nations, but are governing themselves. In colonial West Africa, there is a sufficiently informed leadership to direct public affairs without the supervision of Europeans. What right has any colonial power to expect Africans to become 'Europeans' or to have 100 per cent literacy before it considers them 'ripe' for self-government? Wasn't the African who is now considered 'unprepared' to govern himself 'governing' himself before the advent of Europeans? In fact, the African's way of living even today is more democratic than the much vaunted 'democratic' manner of life and government of the 'West'.

5: WHAT MUST BE DONE

We have demonstrated that the imperialist powers will never give up their political and economic dominance over their colonies until they are compelled to do so. Therefore, we suggest the following general plan, theory and method, leaving the details to be filled in by the truly enlightened leadership that will carry out the colonial liberation.

The growth of the national liberation movement in the colonies reveals:

(1) The contradictions among the various foreign groups and the colonial imperialist powers in their struggle for sources of raw materials and for territories. In this sense imperialism and colonialism become the export of capital to sources of raw materials, the frenzied and heartless struggle for monopolist possession of these sources, the struggle for a re-division of the already divided world, a struggle waged with particular fury by new financial groups and powers seeking newer territories and colonies against the old groups and powers which cling tightly to that which they have grabbed.

(2) The contradictions between the handful of ruling 'civilized' nations and the millions of colonial peoples of the world. In this sense imperialism is the most degrading exploitation and the most inhuman oppression of the millions of peoples living in the colonies. The purpose of this exploitation and oppression is to squeeze out super-profits. The inevitable results of imperialism thus are: (a) the emergence of a colonial intelligentsia; (b) the awakening of national consciousness among colonial peoples; (c) the emergence of a working class movement; and (d) the growth of a national liberation movement.

In present-day historical development, West Africa represents the focus of all these contradictions of imperialism.

Theoretical Basis:

The theory of the national liberation movement in colonial countries proceeds from three fundamental theses:

(1) The dominance of finance capital in the advanced capitalist countries; the export of capital to the sources of raw materials (imperialism) and the omnipotence of a financial oligarchy (finance capital), reveal the character of monopolist capital which quickens the revolt of the intelligentsia and the working class elements of the colonies against imperialism, and brings them to the national liberation movement as their only salvation.

(2) The increase in the export of capital to the colonies; the extension of 'spheres of influence' and colonial possessions until they embrace the whole world; the transformation of capitalism into a world system of financial enslavement and colonial oppression and exploitation of a vast majority of the population of the earth by a handful of the so-called 'civilized' nations.

(3) The monopolistic possession of 'spheres of influence' and colonies; the uneven development of the different capitalist countries leading to a frenzied struggle between the countries which 'have' and the countries which 'have not'. Thus war becomes the only method of restoring the disturbed equilibrium. This leads to aggravation of a third front, the inter-capitalist alliance front (e.g. Anglo-American imperialism), which weakens imperialism and facilitates the amalgamation of the first two fronts against imperialism, namely, the front of the working class of the capitalist countries and the front of the toiling masses of the colonies for colonial emancipation. Hence these conclusions:

(a) Intensification of the crisis within the imperialist-colonial powers in the colonies.

(b) Intensification of the crisis in the colonies and the growth of the liberation movement against local colonial governments on the colonial front.

(c) That under imperialism war cannot be averted and that a coalition between the proletarian movement in the capitalist countries and the colonial liberation movement, against the world front of imperialism becomes inevitable.

It is, therefore, in this alone that the hope of freedom and independence for the colonies lies. But how to achieve this? First and foremost, Organization of the Colonial Masses.

The duty of any worthwhile colonial movement for national liberation, however, must be the organization of labour and of youth; and the abolition of political illiteracy. This should be accomplished through mass political education which keeps in constant contact with the masses of colonial peoples. This type of education should do away with that kind of intelligentsia who have become the very architects of colonial enslavement.

Then, the organizations must prepare the agents of progress, must find the ablest among its youth and train their special interests (technological, scientific and political) and establish an education fund to help and to encourage students of the colonies to study at home and abroad, and must found schools of its own for the dissemination of political education. The main purpose of the organization is to bring about the final death of colonialism and the discontinuance of foreign imperialist domination. The organization must root itself and secure its basis and strength in the labour movement, the farmers (the workers and peasantry) and the youth. This national liberation movement must struggle for its own principles and to win its aims.

It must have its own press. It cannot live separately from, nor deviate from the aims and aspirations of the masses, the organized force of labour, the organized farmers, and the responsible and cogent organization of youth. These form the motive force of the colonial liberation movement and as they develop and gain political consciousness, so the drive for liberation leaves the sphere of mere ideas and becomes more real.

The peoples of the colonies know precisely what they want. They wish to be free and independent, to be able to feel themselves on an equal with all other peoples, and to work out their own destiny without outside interference, and to be unrestricted to attain an advancement that will put them on a par with other technically advanced nations of the world. Outside interference does not help to develop their country. It impedes and stifles and crushes not only economic progress, but the spirit and indigenous enterprise of the peoples themselves.

The future development of the people of West Africa and of other colonial peoples can only take place under conditions of political freedom that will assure ample latitude for the formation and execution of economic plans and social legislation, as are now imperative for any truly civilized country, that will be truly beneficial to the people and that will be supported and approved by the people themselves. Such conditions cannot exist under alien governments and the people will certainly not prosper under colonialism and imperialism.

We therefore advance the following programme, confident that it will meet with the enthusiastic support and approval of the great masses of colonial peoples because it puts into concrete form what are their already expressed or instinctive desires:

(1) Political Freedom, i.e. complete and absolute independence from the control of any foreign government.

(2) Democratic Freedom, i.e. freedom from political tyranny and the establishment of a democracy in which sovereignty is vested in the broad masses of the people.

(3) Social Reconstruction, i.e. freedom from poverty and economic exploitation and the improvement of social and economic conditions of the people so that they will be able to find better means of achieving livelihood and asserting their right to human life and happiness.

Thus the goal of the national liberation movement is the realization of complete and unconditional independence, and the building of a society of peoples in which the free development of each is the condition for the free development of all.

PEOPLES OF THE COLONIES, UNITE: The working men of all countries are behind you.